

The Problem

Anchors often cause problems on small boats. Effective anchor designs use sharp points, hooks, and spikes but these anchors are carried flat on the boat's deck where they can be reached quickly. Many anchors require a short chain that connects to the anchor rope. This assembly creates a "trip-and-fall" hazard that boaters must step over and around. Anchors designed without a protective vinyl coating will damage the boat deck by repeated contact. Anchor compartments, when present on a boat, are often too small to load and unload quickly or quietly. Anchor retrieval sometimes brings mud and grass into the boat. All of these problems are well known to boaters. As a result of these various problems, the situation shown in the photo is a common scene.

The Solution

AnchorUP is a slender polyethylene container that holds the anchor in a stable, upright position. It accommodates anchors rated for boats up to 36 feet long, and it has a small footprint—requiring less than half of the deck space normally required by a complete anchor-chain-rope assembly. Because both ends are rounded, the boater can walk safely on deck even when barefoot. Anchors load and unload quickly. Debris—such as mud and grass pulled up on the anchor—stays in the container.

- Quiet anchor removal - doesn't spook fish
